Standard accent, elite sociolect, indexicality and sociolinguistic change

Period 8 Nov 2023

Description

We know that pronunciation changes over time, that younger generations use not only words but also sounds in different ways to their parents and grandparents. What kinds of indexical signals do older forms of pronunciation send to younger speakers, and how do we see evidence of this?

Are older ways of speaking seen as 'traditional', 'old-fashioned' or something more? In this talk, I will also explore the notion of 'standard accent' and compare it as a social construct to the sociolinguistically-grounded elite sociolects of British English. This is important because alongside social change and language change, we also see sociolinguistic change: the embedding of language forms in society and the values they have are also subject to variation and change over time.
