Profile

John Damm Scheuer, Master of Science in International Business, PhD, Associate Professor in The Department of Social Sciences and Business, Roskilde University, Denmark. His main research interests include translation as a perspective on organizational change. Socio-technical (IT-) system design through effects-driven participatory design and learning. Other theories and perspectives related to organizational change including: organizational change theories, implementation science, policy-og strategy-implementation research, the design perspective on change of organizations, innovation perspectives on public organizations and public-private innovation networks and ventriloquism as a perspective on the communicative constitution of organizations (the CCO perspective). He has conducted empirical studies, edited and contributed to several books and written research articles in areas such as translation of clinical pathways in health care organizations, translation in Scandinavian Institutionalism, stakeholder management and CSR, design, effects-driven IT-development, and innovation in public organizations and public-private innovation networks. His latest research project is focusing on improvement of translation of rules aimed at assuring a secure work environment on building sites (financed by the Danish Working Environment Research Fund)

Area of expertise

Major research projects

The Seventh Framework EU research project ServPPIN investigated how service innovation and public-private innovation networks contribute to economic growth and welfare. It focused on how public-private innovation is produced in public-private networks and upon how such networks might be managed better in order to improve their performance. Case studies in 11 EU countries were made, analysed and compared in the areas of healthcare, transport and knowledge service.

Designing Human Technologies is a new design-oriented research area at Roskilde University. It has as its aim to be constructive (to design) and to search for solutions in close collaboration with citizens and users having a need or a problem. The research project obtain this aim by analysing how designs are used and take part in human life and through designing solutions to selected problems through action research. The project builds on a human principle where the users, and central stakeholders are involved in ethical and societal related reflections, the design process itself as well as in verifying that the designed and constructed solutions contributes to fulfilling a need or solving a problem.

Other research projects and activities

Research project: Effect-driven participatory design of patient-flow monitor for emergency departments. The aim of the research project is to develop a monitor that may make it possible to foresee and intervene in patients flow through emergency departments so that crowding and thus “piling up” of patients in the emergency and other hospital departments may be avoided.

Research project: Clinical Communication. The above mentioned project is one of 4 projects belonging to the Clinical Communication project. The Clinical Communication project focuses upon user and effect driven design of software solutions used in electronic whiteboards and mobile equipment connected to these whiteboards in hospitals.

The Robust Organizational Translation project (ROT): This research project focuses upon the encounter between innovative ideas and practice in organizations. It studies such encounters and change processes as translation processes. The aim of the project is to further develop the translation perspective as an approach to analyse and intervene in organizational change processes so that more robust socio-technical systems and organizations may be designed and constructed. The project has resulted in the formation of an international network of researchers interested in organizational “translation studies” and a track proposal that has been accepted by The European Academy of Management (EURAM) conference to be held in Paris in June 2016.

Network for Design of Robust Organisational Change: The network is a meeting place for researchers and practitioners interested in what may contribute to more robust organizational change processes in practice in organizations. Researchers and practitioners in the network explore different types of knowledge produced by different communities of researchers which may contribute to more robust organizational change processes in practice. Types of research and knowledge that have been discussed by the network include: Implementation science, the translation perspective on change, relational coordination and social capital, resistance to change and nudging.
